

Leaders' Role in Helping Employees Manage Anxiety and Mental Health

- Over the course of your career, most of your employees will experience stress, personal problems, and/or a mental health problem.
- Mental health problems are common but can become severe and have a significant impact on the workplace.
- It is not the role of leaders to diagnose, counsel, or treat personal and mental health problems.
- Is IS the role of leaders to a) provide a safe and engaging workplace, b) champion healthy lifestyles that drive resilience, c) identify when there are signs an employee is struggling, and d) make a referral early on to supportive resources.
- Some important considerations for leaders in helping employees manage anxiety and build good mental health:
 - Establish trust by demonstrating a commitment to your work and your team, open transparent communication, consistent behavior, sincerity, and emotional intelligence.
 - Be very clear about your expectations and goals for your team members. Set objective measures of success and hold everyone accountable. Set challenging goals and celebrate successes.
 - Showing empathy by working to understand others. Step into their shoes and let people know you are sincerely interested and concerned about what is important to them.
 - Recognize the signs an employee may be struggling with anxiety: nervousness, social withdrawal, reduced performance, increase absences, problems with memory and concentration, trouble making routine decisions, irritability, and/or signs of substance abuse.
 - Check in. Ask, “Are you OK?” Show empathy and acknowledge you’ve noticed changes. Then just listen.
 - Offer flexibility. Hold employees accountable for performance but engage in a discussion about what the employee may need in terms of accommodations, changes to schedules and work arrangements, or time off. Small gestures can make a big difference.
 - Communicate and make referrals to the EAP. The free, confidential benefits of Caterpillar’s Global Employee Assistance Program are available to all employees and immediate family members worldwide to help address stress, anxiety, and other mental health issues.
- Caterpillar’s Employee Assistance Program (EAP) is a valuable resource for leaders to a) refer employees who are having problems with stress and anxiety and b) gain consultant on building relationships with their teams and coworkers.
